Zermatt, SWITZERLAND

FARMERS, MOUNTAIN CLIMBERS, WINE-SIPPING TOURISTS... NO ONE IS IMMUNE TO THE REAL-LIFE GLORY OF THE MATTERHORN. By Kelley McMillan with all of the amenities of a world-class resort, in the summer you'll still hear cowbells clanging loudly through town as shepherds drive their herds up to higher pastures, causing some locals to complain. Believe it or not, cowbell noise pollution is one of the town's most contentious issues.

I'd look cute in a dirndl. > Ich würde schauen in ein dirndl niedlich.

After a morning spent skiing the Breithorn, a

IT'S 11 O'CLOCK ON A bluebird day in Zermatt.

The hooked pyramid of the Matterhorn pierces a cloudless sky, and creamy spring snow covers the slopes, which should be crowded but aren't. The action, instead, is in the many trailside cafés, where "skiers" sip coffee and nibble pastries.

To be sure, Zermatt's skiing is some of the best in the world. Its 153 miles of trails span

three mountains-Klein

Matterhorn, Gornergrat and Rothorn. Visitors can ski into Italy for the day, and, thanks the season never ends. But Zermatt was a quiet farming hamlet until the 19th century, when it was discovered by European aristocrats and alpinists hungry to conquer the Matterhorn. Lifts started spinning in 1928. These days, the old wooden farmhouses remain, but lively après-ski bars, charming B&Bs, and upscale restaurants now fill out the village core.

Zermatt is car-free, and horse-drawn carriages

rumble up the cobblestone streets. Though teeming

European visitors are as fond of the food and wine as they are of the skiing, and few places capture this ski-to-eat to the Theodul Glacier, philosophy better.

us who came to hear Switzerland's most famous vodelers. I was told to take a deep breath and then sing by moving air from my belly to the

In the summer you'll still hear cowbells clanging loudly through town as shepherds drive their herds up to higher pastures.

popular ski tour easily assessed from the resort, my guide and I head to lunch at Chez Vrony, an 18th-century farmhouse. We sit on a deck overlooking a sleepy farming village and tuck into platters of dried local beef, homemade sausage and alpine cheeses. Around us, people pop bottles of rosé, soak up the sun and nap on comfy deck chairs.

After lunch, we carve up soft corn snow, then head to the Hennu Stall, an openair bar on the lower part of the mountain. The music is live, and by four o'clock girls are dancing on tables. After drinks, we make our way to town, passing the Champagne Bar, an old farmhouse tucked into the woods off Sunnegga's home run. Back in town, Zermatt's cobblestone streets clipclop with contented skiers, weathered mountain guides and slick Euros prosting and laughing over steins of Carlsberg lager. I say goodbye to my guide, who disappears into the swirl, skis over one shoulder and a pitchfork over the other.

More cowbell! >Mehr kubglocke!

Is there a more iconic peak? For equal measures of beauty and adventure, Zermatt and the Matterhorn

How Hard Could Yodeling Be?

I have a weakness for all things Swiss. So when I visited Zermatt, I took yodeling lessons. There were 20 of back of my throat. I gave it my all. It sounded like an elk mating call.

Ski mountaineer Bill Briggs once told me yodeling evokes the grandeur of the mountains. Maybe when he does it, all high and tight and beautiful. Me? Not so grand. -K.M.

REST

> The sleek Omnia, with 30 balconied rooms set on a rock shelf above Zermatt. is a modernist's paradise dressed in dark granite, white oak and clean lines. Request a room with a view of the Matterhorn.

MUST DO

> The Matterhorn wasn't conquered until 1865, when the seven members of Edward Whymper's party finally reached the summit. Only three survived the descent. For more on this and other fascinating mountaineering stories, visit the Matterhorn Museum.

EAT & DRINK

> The restaurant inside the boutique Hotel Cervo (another great lodging option) is becoming the go-to spot for creatively updated Swiss fare.

DETAILS

> Fly into either Zurich or Geneva and take the train to Zermatt. The town is car-free anyway, so unless you're road-tripping elsewhere, you won't need a vehicle.